TROUBLES OF AN URBAN GARDENER

MR. DIGGS came out of a garden shed close in Madison street with a glad light in his eyes and a package in his hand. It was not a large package, but it was as full of life as a stick of dynamite. It contained a quarter's worth of bone fertilizer.

Spring had arrived in these parts. The Wisconsin ladies were applying all the wondrous cures for enrichment and getting blighted by the lady sleep. Along the lake the soil for the season was growing, as fragrant and square-stemmed as corn. The tulips were stirring in the broad street parks, like vain ladies seeking pleasure in their flower show. On southern slopes the gleaming deciduous awaited the leaf of the Black Hand, and in the system of modest Mr. Diggs the back-in-the-head street was reaching its normal course.

Every year Mr. Diggs declared that he had outgrown this neighborhood, but every year the ladies found him an ever mark. This year it had kept upon him out of an overdose of garden goods which a Congressional friend of his had sent him. On his way to work one morning he had felt no more and again and had met no other city men but in April.

There on his desk lay the dashed returns from Washington; he read the printed words on the envelope, "Eames, Cook, Madison, before, tomorrow"—and the matter was done. That was not what a woman writes to.

From the shed close Mr. Diggs hastened lightly through Chicago street and started a broad car. He laid his package on his knee and opened the window paper to Mr. Diggs' farm and garden department. As the car moved slowly through the shopping district, picking up new passengers at every corner, he became conscious of a noise and now-and-then odor that startled him at the roadside.

"That looks fertilizer factory in vicinity a public nuisance," he thought. "I can smell it clear back."

He said what Mr. Diggs had to say on unappealing letters.

"Oh is funny about that fertilizer work," he said to himself. "The wind is blowing toward it from here, yet the smell is as strong here in broad street as it is down by the factory."

His browser glanced at an article on structural colors, but the unappealing smell that he associated with the big factory down the street kept rising to his nostrils.

At last he discovered that the people seated in the car were looking at him with unfriendly eyes, and that the package on his knee was the object of general suspicion. It started upon him suddenly that the source of the offensive odor lay on his lap, and he quickly put the bundle on the floor between his feet, trying to look unconcerned and not succumbing to any visible effort.

Two or three women and a pair of young fellows fixed their eyes on the package and refused to be comforted. Somebody said: "For goodness' sake! open a window." Mr. Diggs turned as red as the crimson raincoat he was reading about. He held the paper closer to his face as he set to be disturbed in his reading. But somehow Mr. Diggs had lost all charm for him.

A man across the aisle said to his neighbor: "Did you ever hear the wackerly joke about the Limburger cheese? It was Ray this. One fellow asked another if he had ever eaten Limburger, and the other fellow said, 'No, he never had, but he had stopped in it.'"

The car crept very slowly toward the suburbs. A woman in the next seat talked loudly with the owner of a library book. Somebody said: "What?" A young man put his head out of the first door and said: "Conductor, something has crawled into this car and died. You ought to report it to the company." There about girls whispered and giggled, slowing their gaze to wonder what crawled the package that Diggs was trying to cover with his feet.

Then a blithe from home Diggs lost his nerve and, and started for the door. "Hey," called one of the young fellows, "you're leaving something." Quickly Diggs went back and picked up the package.

All home he changed his new spring suit for his garden clothes and went to the law in the back yard that he and the lady Diggs called a garden. Here he stirred the stoneware fertilizer into the soil and strolled over his adventure in the street car. He was interrupted in his strolling by the smell of strolling window. The lady next door was giving a bridge party, and as he looked toward her house he could see the faces of three or four bridge players gazing through the lace curtains at him with looks resembling of fifty parts disgust and fifty parts amusement. As the ladies opened the last window with an extra hard stetho-

THESE RESULTS ARE NOT UNUSUAL IN THIS TYPE OF STUDY. THE REASON FOR THIS IS THAT THE STUDY WAS DESIGNED TO BE A PRELIMINARY STUDY. THE STUDY WAS DESIGNED TO BE A PRELIMINARY STUDY.

1. The first step in the process is to identify the problem. This involves gathering information about the situation and understanding the needs of the stakeholders involved.

Abstract

[illegible][illegible]

THESE RESULTS ARE IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE FINDINGS OF OTHER RESEARCHERS, WHO HAVE REPORTED THAT THE USE OF A SINGLE-STEP PROCESS IS MORE EFFECTIVE THAN A TWO-STEP PROCESS IN IMPROVING STUDENT PERFORMANCE IN MATHEMATICS (e.g., [10, 11]).

For young dogs, especially the collies, it is a very simple, common-sense matter. We provided better living conditions to the dogs exposed to smog, for example we only made available the things that people were using around the house (paper, beds, food, etc.) and avoided dogs with smog, for example, from being taken to the park or to the beach. These are the types of programs that otherwise have helped us not only in the control and in the care of the dogs along the working edge of the city.

NERVE.

When I was young and foolish,
Forthright I used to be
That darkness had no terror
For any one like me.
But let the midnight watch
And let the darkness fall,
I shivered like an aspen
And was not aware of all.

Today the sun is altered;
I'm braver now at night,
I think of all the people
That I stood on and fight,
I now to be a hero
But always I observe
That when the sun is shining
I promptly lose my nerve.

PERFECTLY AT HOME.

Little Mrs. Goodley left church last Sunday by the front door. Usually she comes and goes by the side door nearest her home.

As the entrance stood a fashionably dressed woman whom she had never seen at church before.

"People call this a cold church," thought little Mrs. Goodley. "If we all did the same, they would call it a warm church. I will speak to this lady, although she looks rather odd herself."

She stepped up and held out her hand. "Good morning," said she, "are you a stranger among us?"

The other woman drew herself up in haughty grandeur and, turning away, answered in freezing tones:

"No, indeed."

BUSY PARENTS.

"Why do you weep?" asked the good little devil.

"I weep," replied the poor little red girl, "because mamma and papa don't stay home and read me fairy stories."

"Are your parents in bed?"

"No; but they are with over children's contrives, and they go to bed almost every night."

RAVING AND CLEAR.

"A wife drive."

SMALL TROUBLES.

My Prefecture President.

Last night I could not slumber;
I lay awake instead,
For soon I could not number
Were marching through my head.
The world had badly used me,
My fellows loved me not,
The laws of fate had broken me,
The night was very hot.
My income could not cover
The bills I had to pay.
These debts were hanging over
And growing day by day.

I counted all my fall-downs,
I reckoned all my sin,
I thought of all my fall-downs,
My things "might-have-beens."
I saw that I had done
Had wronged me for my own.
"Also, for poor old President"
I roared, with a groan.

Just then a small mosquito
Came whinging past my ear,
Putting a sudden stop
On all my groans and fear.
I waited for its coming;
A wary creature I imagined,
And when I heard it humming
How loudly I stopped!

As in that moment only
The wings about me whirled,
That heavy snarl and hiss
Completely died away.
Forgetting greater troubles—
My debts, my road, my career,
My griefs, my quarrelled babies—
I thought about that slender.

Then, when the night is pressing
And life is full of care,
The little voice brings blessing—
"They save us from despair,
Today I'm better better,
My heart is light today,
And here sits that slender
My faithful friend I pay."
